

When the site was established, this area of West Bath was open farmland situated on the edge of the then village of Twerton.

During the Second World War, the site was crucial to the local "Dig for Victory" campaign, providing food security to working-class families.